Vermont Senators Find Themselves Chairmen of Minor Committees

AS RESULT OF CHANGE IN PARTY MAJORITY

Buildings Very Noticeable in City

Washington, D. C., April 24.—When the political complexion of the Senate changed, placing the Democrats in the majority and the Republicans in the minority, all of the committees of the Senate suffered a shake-up of such magnitude that it was impossible for some time to recognize any one of the great committees by its personnel. Many Republicans, who previously held the chairmanships of large committees and occupied commodious committee rooms in the capitol building, have been relegated to the head of insignificant committees, known as minority committees, and have been compelled to move to smaller quarters.

Vermont's senators suffered with the others. Senator Dillingham, who was chairman of the committee on privileges of the twenty minority committees, the University of the United States, and Senator Page, formerly chairman of the committee on Cuban relations, now heads the committee on disposition of useless papers in the executive departments. They still retain, however, their membership on many important committees, but they become minority members in stead of majority.

Senator Dillingham is a member of the following committees: Appropria-tions, audit and control of contingent expenses of the Denate, District of Columbia, expenditures in the department of the navy, immigration, judiciary and privileges and elections. Senator Page is a member of the following committees: Agriculture and forestry, educaoceanic canals, naval affairs and print-
